Spencer Greenhalgh is a PhD student in the Educational Psychology and Educational Technology program at Michigan State University. He grew up (mostly) in Kentucky, but moved to Utah to study French Teaching and Political Science Teaching at Brigham Young University. While at BYU, he also taught French 102 and served on the Humanities College Student Council, which promotes the study of the humanities on campus. After graduating from BYU, he taught French, debate, and keyboarding before coming to East Lansing. Here at MSU, he works with the Master of Arts in Educational Technology program and researches educational technology and authentic learning in non-STEM fields, including foreign language, history, and civics. He is particularly interested in the use of games and simulations in humanities classes.
